How the Game Works

The Guesser

One person from each team comes to the front — back to the board.

The Actors

The rest of the team performs the scenes.

Scoring:

- Each prompt is worth a set number of points based on difficulty
- The team with the most points at the end wins

Rules:

- No speaking or mouthing words
- No spelling things out
- Props and sounds are encouraged — get creative

Goal:

Make the situation clear through group behavior. The better your team coordinates in the huddle, the more points you rack up in the round.

Gameplay:

1. I put up a slide with 8 prompts. Each prompt has a point value based on how hard it is to act out.
2. The Guesser turns around. The Actors huddle for 90 seconds to make a plan — who does what, which prompts to go after first.
3. When time is called, the Actors have 3 minutes to get their Guesser to say as many prompts as possible. No words. No mouthing. Props and sounds are fair game — get creative.
4. The round ends when either 3 minutes are up or every prompt is guessed — whichever comes first.
5. Points are tallied. A new Guesser comes up. We go again.

What This Is Really About

Your body says more than you think

Most of what you communicate never goes through your mouth.

Communicating Beyond Words

Tone, timing, movement, reaction. Strip the words out and you find out what's actually being said.

Collaboration Under Pressure

When words are off the table, your body has to do all the work.

Presence

Paying attention to the people in front of you instead of the phone in your hand.

Play is sacred. Enjoy the game.

What This Week Was Really About

Presence isn't a personality trait. It's a skill — and like most skills, most people never practice it because nobody tells them it matters.

This week you had to read a room, mirror a partner, and convince a group of people what you meant without saying a single word. None of that works if you're somewhere else in your head.

The people who are genuinely enjoyable to be around — the ones who make you feel like what you're saying matters — they're not doing anything magical. They're just actually present, with you, not thinking of being anywhere else. That's it.

Turns out, that's exceedingly rare, but not un-learnable.

Before You Go

Pick One Prompt To Discuss With A Neighbor or Small Group Nearby

Think about the last conversation you had where you felt the other person was genuinely with you.

Explain the concept of presence to a neighbor like they're 12, then describe the attributes of people who have that quality, comparing them to those who don't

This week, every activity required you to be fully in the room — no phone, no checking out.

What did you notice about yourself when that was the only option?

A paper towel on a wet counter absorbs whatever's put in front of it.

What's the difference between that and actually choosing what you pay attention to?
